Titled: The Pulse of Progress: Reclaiming
The Art of Healing through Competency

TO SUMMARIZE:

When I first entered medical college, I was overwhelmed by the vast syllabus and unfamiliar environment. The transition from school to medical education brought confusion, anxiety, and a feeling that I wasn't prepared for what lay ahead.

Everything changed when I discovered competency-based learning. This approach focused on hands-on experience, applying knowledge in real-time, and developing skills in a structured, personalized way. Through simulation labs and patient interactions, I started building not just clinical abilities, but also confidence, empathy, and effective communication.

Gradually, I realized that medicine is more than memorizing facts—it's about understanding people. Competency-based learning helped me grow into a more capable and compassionate future doctor, changing both the way I learn and how I view the role of a physician.
